Dana Brownlee, president of professional training development company advises against initiating a romance with your manager, or, likewise, with anyone who reports to you directly or indirectly. Most places of business frown upon the idea of co-workers becoming romantically involved. You would have to check the rule book though or something like that. I would say that it is never a good idea to date anyone in a superior or inferior position even if your company doesn't object first. Make sure you are both clear about who will know about the relationship and eating. In truth, without a contract you are an 'employee at will' meaning either side employer or employee can terminate the relationship at any time without notice. To tension him to instruct this, you could take him to courtroom and report a wrongful termination lawsuit. My girl friend works at the same store as me. If management asks you, tell the truth but do not get defensive or act like some great injustice has been done. Yes, you can be fired. Plus we had nice, clean break-ups. Perhaps that makes sense given the amount of time we spend at work: In an office relationship, you can relate to the struggles someone faces from 9 to 5, says Brownlee. Money may receive compensation for some coworker to products and services on this website. First of all, ask yourself how well you know your potential partner. His boyfriend had a big mouth. It can interfere with your work. But lying is going to get you fired just as quickly, and it will be a lot easier to find another job when the answer to "why did you leave your last position" is "There was a company policy against fraternization and I was dating the receptionist so I left" than if it is "I lied about whether I was violating a company policy or not". Because that can get you fired and you know how to separate your work life from your personal life. Not literally, unless one supervises the other because it would cause a conflict of interest. Don't sleep with your boss, don't date your boss, don't sleep with or date people you're in charge of at work, and for the most part, don't sleep with people who you work alongside unless you're both masters of casual sex with no emotional involvement whatsoever. Two things I am tired of typing: 1. Do what you are paid to do and do your best to ignore it. If you're that horny, buy a good vibrator or find someone who you don't work with to have sex with. What is the name of your state only. Not all companies care; some do. Whether it's dating a coworker or coworker of coming in late. Why do a company care about it at all. Most places of business frown upon the idea of co-workers becoming romantically involved.
